

Dear Editor,

I wasn't at all surprised by the article by Matthew Fort that appeared on the Guardian's website yesterday. What surprised me was its distasteful tones; however, unfortunately, we are now more than used to the vulgarity of some media and even of a certain kind of politics.

The left wing, with its loudspeakers, persist in baying at the Moon, finding themselves further away from the real problems and fenced in their own sterile moral orthodoxy, which impairs any kind of development and hinders a clear vision of reality.

With regret, we are forced to deliver bad news to this kind of left: Stalin is dead. And we can safely bet he never set foot in a McDonald's.

On the contrary, this is something that thousands of European youngsters do every day. At the same time, thousands of European farmers are facing the consequences of the worst economic crisis since '29. McItaly will bring to the Italian farmers three million and 448 thousand Euros of additional income per month. It will also enable McDonald's clients to eat a healthy burger made with PDO and PGI 'Made in Italy' products.

We hope this will convince them to forget about junk food and choose a healthier and better quality food. We are sure it will work.

Then, we will become modern Jesuits and try to "convert the infidels" of the left, who have never dirtied their hands by working in the fields. They are the same people who, after preaching against those who - like me - work to ensure quality as a right for everybody instead of a luxury for élite consumers, run towards the 'Organic Food' aisles of supermarkets with their heavy wallets and light consciences.

Luca Zaia
Minister of Agriculture Food and Forestry Policies